Cruz has been engineering quite a novel stunt in getting his booze into town ready for sale, without the officers getting next. Naturally it was no trouble to get the booze as far as the city limits of Tempe, but to take it farther without anyone conveiving the idea meant a different means of transportation than by horse and wagon. Eventually a little go-cart was pressed into service, its bed standing just a little higher than the neck of the beer bottles. On top of the liquor the Mexican each time placed a pile
